

KUNSTHALLE BASEL

KETUTA
ALEXI-MESKHISHVILI

VERKLEIDUNG

17.9.2022–
6.8.2023

A woman's toothy grin plucked from the packaging of a drugstore flower bouquet, a silicone nipple bought on eBay, a fragment of a car's flame decals, a plastic bag printed with traditional Georgian ornamentation found in Byzantine churches, a cocktail swizzle stick in the form of a palm tree. To extract these motifs from the five large-scale prints that grace Kunsthalle Basel's back wall or even to describe the ways they are rendered—the blurriness, overexposures, overlaid images, scratches, and gossamer-like transparencies—hardly conveys the peculiar quality that makes you want to look again and again at Ketuta Alexi-Meskhishvili's work. Here, experimental techniques and explosions of chroma manifest a kind of accumulated, painterly saturation that draws you in, all while the results teeter on a razor's edge between the abstract and the figurative, a representation of a thing and the perfume of that thing. EN

The Georgian-born photographer knows well that photography used on monumental surfaces in public space typically serves commercial purposes—as an advertisement of some sort. Go there, covet this, consume that. Thus, Kunsthalle Basel's outdoor, circa thirty-meter-long back wall presented a challenge that the artist took up with great interest. In response, she delved into her archive from the past few years and chose five images to be printed on the kind of PVC mesh typically used to shroud construction scaffolding. Each seems to toy with the notion of fast messaging, memes, and emojis (smile, nipple, flames, sun, palm tree) only to undermine the quick and reductive communication that these imply.

Specific photographic strategies make it possible for the artist to conjure a singular kind of diaphanous or otherworldly presence from the cheap, everyday objects we see in these images. Among her arsenal of techniques is the rayograph (employed in the pieces on view, with the exception of the image of the flames). Such "camera-less" images are made by placing objects directly on the surface of negative film emulsion in a darkroom and exposing them to light. Alexi-Meskhishvili has a predilection for using tiny lights that fit onto one's fingertips—more commonly associated with nightclubs and raves—as her method of exposure. In working this way, she manages to explore that space of translation where an index of something is not an exact copy but contains accidents and allows for a new kind of image to develop. And when a camera comes into play (as it does for the image of the flames), she regularly uses a large format analog film camera—that slow and heavy converse to the fast and featherlight digital cameras that proliferate, small enough to fit into your pocket. Whatever her method, the black frame of the Kodak film sheet regularly appears on an image’s printed edges, and one might spot cuts or scratches from a knife blade that marred a negative before printing, or the traces of the clips that hold a negative in place. These, too, become part of her images, pushing back against the assiduous cropping and editing typically associated with the photographer’s crafting of a perfect image as well as the slick and seamless aesthetic that photography’s more commercial formats demand. Focusing on a constellation that conveys mystery, highlights the surface level of the image, and troubles perception, Alexi-Meskhishvili transmits something at once furtive but spectacular. Something that she describes as “outside of language and categorization, something other than information,” in other words: “the antithesis of clear messaging.”

Ketuta Alexi-Meskhishvili was born in 1979 in Tbilisi; she lives and works in Berlin.

The project is made possible through the generous support of HEIVISCH, with in-kind support from the Stadtreinigung, Tiefbauamt Basel-Stadt.

The mediation projects are realized through the generous support of the Art Mentor Foundation Lucerne, the Beisheim Stiftung, and the Canton of Basel-Stadt.

Thanks to
Frank Elbaz, Anna Kraft, Marie-Christine Molitor,
Lisa Offermann, Micky Schubert, Martin Stoecklin,
Heinrich Vischer, Andro Wekua, and Melina Wilson

Kunsthalle Basel / Basler Kunstverein is generously supported by the Canton of Basel-Stadt.

Kanton Basel-Stadt

Kultur

Support for Kunsthalle Basel’s yearly program is provided by Saint Laurent.

SAINT LAURENT

Ketuta Alexi-Meskhishvili
Verkleidung, 2022
consisting of (from left to right)
Dog Smile, 2020
for anyone of you, 2021
who lived well (flames), 2016
Georgian Ornament, 2020
Sss, 2016
UV inkjet print on PVC
Each 3.9 × 4.9 m

All works courtesy the artist; galerie frank elbaz, Paris; and LC Queisser, Tbilisi

GUIDED TOURS, MEDIATION, AND PUBLIC PROGRAMS

Mal•Mal – draw from a live model in the current exhibitions, in English and German
28.09.2022, Wednesday, 6–8 pm
Materials will be provided.

Tandem guided tour, in German
23.10.2022, Sunday, 3 pm
Kunsthalle Basel and SAM Swiss Architecture Museum offer a joint tour of their current exhibitions, highlighting the intersections between architecture and art.

mittwoch-matinée, in German
28.12.2022, Wednesday, 10 am–noon
As part of the museen basel event series, the current exhibitions will be explored and discussed together.

Experimente in der Dunkelkammer, in German
25.03.2023, Saturday, 11 a.m.–5 p.m.
Inspired by the artistic practice of Alexi-Meskhishvili and in collaboration with fotopresto Basel, a full-day photo workshop will experiment with cyanotype, photogram, and photographic techniques in the darkroom. Interested persons from 16 years on, please contact kunstvermittlung@kunsthallebasel.ch, with a contribution of 30 CHF for materials and lunch.

For all tours and events, registration is kindly requested at kunstvermittlung@kunsthallebasel.ch, where you can also get more information.

In the Kunsthalle Basel library, you will find a selection of publications related to Ketuta Alexi-Meskhishvili.

Follow us on Instagram and share your photos and impressions with #kunsthallebasel.

More information at kunsthallebasel.ch